

The Cure of Saul

"The words of this and the five following Hymns are alter'd from the Cure of Saul: They are design'd to represent a regular series [of] the effects of David's Music upon the disturbed mind of Saul and the progress of his Recovering from Melancholy, and his Return to Heaven, and his Repentance.

N. B. The first time, the Treble is to be sung by itself accompany'd only with the Harpsichord: the 2nd time to be repeated as chorus.

No. 1"

Phocion Henley (1728-64)

The Cure of Saul

Notes:

This edition is made from a photocopy of Henley's manuscript kindly supplied by Robert Barr. Barr also transcribed the notation, and this edition is based on his transcription. In some cases Henley's intentions are unclear, and editorial decisions have had to be made. This applies especially in the case of the many grace notes, where his notation is inconsistent and often almost illegible. They are written out in full, but are so numerous that they are not individually noted; other emendations are noted.

No source for the text has yet been found. Spelling has been modernised, initial letters of lines of verse capitalised to aid phrasing, and punctuation added, often conjecturally.

The reference to a harpsichord before two movements, the occasional additional instrumental notes (reproduced here in small notation), and the string symphony before the final movement suggest that Henley envisaged string accompaniment for the full choral items, and basso continuo throughout. Henley writes his choral alto and tenor parts in C clefs, but uses G clefs for the tenor parts in two trio movements; the reason for the change is unclear.

The forte marking in bar 70 is Henley's only dynamic. The consecutives in bar 168 and the harmony in bar 248 are sic. Verbal material in quotes is Henley's. Metronome markings are editorial suggestions.
